- Regionalism, in principle, need not be regarded as an unhealthy or antinational phenomenon-unless it takes a militant, aggressive turn and encourages the growth of successionist tendencies. If regionalism is to be regarded and as an unhealthy phenomenon decentralisation too would be objectional, which of course it is not. So broadly, there is nothing basically contradiction between nationalism and regionalism, but both can be treated as healthy. The growth of regional values and consolidation of regional forces, as such, do not pose a challenge to the central administration of
